

The Daily Market Report

PORTLAND, Feb. 23—The supply of fresh salmon in the local market is now the lightest known in months and in the event the Governor signs the bill passed by the recent Legislature which, supposedly, was to be a measure of protection for Columbia River salmon, there will be no fresh salmon for the local trade during the Lenten season, except for the short period between now and the first of March.

The law in question which was prepared by a joint state commission representing this State and the State of Washington, is now awaiting the signature of Governor Chamberlain, and it is understood that he will approve it. The Washington Legislature has not yet acted on the measure, but it is expected that the lawmakers of that State will endorse it, and this accomplished, the old quarrel between the fishing interests of the two States will be ended, for a time at least.

Changes in Butter Market.
The butter market for the time is a matter of much uncertainty. Today quotations on standard creamery run all the way from 35 to 37 cents a pound, some of the makers raising the price a cent and others two, while two of the local creameries announced no change in the prices at all. The chances are that the advances made by some of the operators today will not hold for long, for a material increase in the cream supply is a certainty in the near future. The best grades of county creamery today were quoted at 35 cents.

The cheese market was very firm at the last quotations.

In the egg market today the situation was much the same as in the case of butter. Receipts for the day were moderately heavy, but there was little in the way of carry-over stock in evidence, as a consequence of the active days, and market values were more or less a matter of guesswork. But it was generally conceded that the brisk demand from the North is ended for the present, and the outlook is for another drop here before the end of the week. Today quotations on the street ranged from 20 to 22 cents.
